Sophie Calle, the French artist, remember?
 The one who followed strangers & who got a job as a chambermaid & who stole little things of everyday intimacies.
 You read about her in that book about Johannesburg & portraits with keys.
 The other story about Sophie Calle, is her heartbreak how she was walking in the street in Prague, or Budapest, or Berlin
 or Brussels
 & she got this email on her phone, from her boyfriend
 (or a text)
 breaking up with her (the email, or the text).
 & (she was heartbroken) she had the email reviewed & analyzed by 107 experts (all of them women) in:
 copy-editing & psychiatry & talmudic scriptures & etiquette-consulting & also judges actresses lawyers balarinas a philologist philosophers grammarians her mother singers & she turned it into art & an exhibit & a book the break-up—the letters—the whole thing.
 (take care of yourself, it ended, the email or the text)

You, me: your break-up text
 it said:
 ur a piece of shit dont u ever and I mean NEVER come near me
 & later to my fourth or fifth goodbye email or maybe it was the one before last you said:
 i can't read on, your pathetic clichés

I should send them
 my clichés, the pathetic ones
 to journals & magazines & I should collect them
 the rejection letters
 for a story or an installation

In the morning the memories. [...] & [...] closed with [...] & you [...] your [...]. I had a dream the same one how you were back [...] & I had to know [...] know how many men you fucked after you left me & [...] of these men there had been six. Friends mostly you said you fucked them once mostly just friends.
