

David McAleavey

At the day care center

Cleaning the gerbil cage, Miebeth found one dead. He'd been happy for years, the way gerbils can be happy.

Three or four kids gaped at Miebeth with her coffee can trying to pick up the little corpse while keeping the live one from crawling in, which it kept doing,

making her seem clumsy.

The kids were asking what happened, what's going on, what's wrong.

It's hard to say, "Nothing's wrong," but Miebeth is right, that's what to tell the young.

Buried lives

1.

This side of the window,
four succulents on a shelf, a spider plant, alternating lines of light and shadow from the mini-blinds. Beyond, three elm-like zelkovas in the median, light traffic.

On the hill still mostly white with snow, birds fly in and out of an enormous forsythia like thoughts, sparrow, mockingbird.

Wispy twists of cloud, lined and linked by the blinds, gradually merge to “overcast”;
the sun “goes away”;

mockingbird and sparrow still in the bush.

2.

Not the first time I’ve dreamt about a suicide.

The second time I’ve had this one, where a middle-aged guy with a potbelly standing on the roof of his truck ties a rope around his neck – the other end’s tied to his house – then jumps into a hole which goes through the cab into the earth into a cavern – he’s gone as I watch, me, and not me.

3.

What's under wraps warps. Go carefully around the body.

She'd said he viewed her as meat, as just an organ to jack off into.

She was thinking of Portnoy's Complaint where the guy uses a package of liver.

4.

As for the meaning of our lives – the direction of the river – how the tenderness of love, so real, so persuasive, convinces us we have a purpose – how about the linguist philosopher lecturing in New York claiming many languages double negatives

to intensify negation,

and a few, like English, to form a positive –

though none, so far as he knew, uses two positives

to make a negative –

to which a guy in the back mutters, “Yeah, yeah.”

Remote Vermont lake

Many leaves down and many just falling where we walked in mid-October, a cove where water reflected reds and oranges as if meant to do that, then;

at its edge a shack boarded up, caving in, a length of stovepipe rusting on the roof.
We spoke, as if speech, we spoke as if we would always live where high mountain waters reached their brimming limit, pushed ripple after ripple by the gentle wind.

The linoleum prince

Rising above trees
then steadily higher
the wind loud as drums.

If you need to unravel things, said the novelist, things stop.

My immaturity is voluptuous, cried the chorus of daughters, it is hard to wait
on the wind.

*In the fairy tale,
a linoleum prince is looking for a bride; no one will let him in at the homeproducts fair so he has to wait at the door like a rolled-up magazine the mailman couldn't wedge through the slot.*

Finally a posse of impoverished immigrants comes up and can't get in either lacking enough credit, and to salvage their machismo they haul the roll off.

*He wanted this though he couldn't have known it.
Animals stroke him all over, every morning a woman washes him, and the shoes, the slippers!
No part of him feels unappreciated, none of him trash, even the scraps from cutting to fit him to the room patch worn floors in other rooms, other houses.
The princess he had wanted, pseudomarble countertop and brass trim, window greenhouse and downdraft range,*

*she was abstract anyway,
out of reach,
and now he is happy,
being used is enough, being fully employed, thank you, thank you!*

The pulse-press of puzzled desire imagines objects, deliberates, will not attain them, finds itself being used in an exemplum, and then again
reverts to a rising swell –

Down there, the others, that drum, my own heart –

only to wobble, waft, drift off to ask,

Was it I, lost and alone at the door, a sheaf unraveling in weather, now no longer held by the wind, content if I could be the most ordinary unwealthy flooring?

When the fleet troop of choiring daughters taps across, he perks up enough to admire their trim lines, skirts asweep in the spring gusts circulating on beautiful autumn days, days like today.